

► Guidelines for trade show organizers and exhibitors

Trade show organizers rely on telecom equipment for back office operations such as logistics and maintenance. On their turn, exhibitors might use radio frequencies for demo applications, for example.

In both cases, a license for temporary use of radio frequencies (also known as UTE in Portuguese, meaning temporary use of spectrum) is required in Brazil. These licenses are granted by Anatel, the national telecommunications regulator.

Anatel coordinates the use of telecommunication equipment operating with radio frequencies to avoid degradation or malfunction of telecommunications networks installed in a particular geographic region.

LEARN MORE ABOUT THE PROCEDURES FOR TEMPORARY USE OF RADIO FREQUENCIES (LICENSING).

Pricing

The authorization is chargeable to the user. The fee varies according to the number of channels used and equipment categories.

Operation on a secondary basis

The applicant has no right to protection from interference made by other systems authorized on a primary or secondary basis.

Mandatory local representative

The request for authorization of temporary use of spectrum must be sent to Anatel by an entity holding an Individual Taxpayers' Registry (CPF) or a Corporate Taxpayers' Registry (CNPJ), in addition to other information requested for enrollment in Anatel's system (Mosaico).

Type approval waiver

While they hold valid licenses, the pieces of equipment authorized for temporary use of radio frequencies do not require certification (homologation/type approval).

Warning: if you want to sell telecom equipment in Brazil, a Certificate of Homologation is required. The licensing for temporary use of spectrum does not authorize sales.

The diplomatic missions and the international bodies interested in applying for an authorization of Temporary Use of the Spectrum for the visits of foreign authorities to Brazil, or foreign military ships and airplanes, must directly submit the request to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MRE) in Brasilia. The requests will then be sent to Anatel by the MRE.
